Suddenly, a boom happened a bomb went off <sup>it</sup> destroyed many buildings in the area the Statue of Liberty got destroyed but the Empire State Building didn't get scratched. There were two kids one was waving to the explosion and one kid was waving at them.

"Hey!" shouted the kid. He was trying to go to him he was flabbergasted. ~~of~~ the planets in the sky. There were broken windows, broken pieces and the sky was red. They were in quicksand and he was sinking in the quicksand he had about 10 seconds to get out of there or he would die and the buildings were getting cracked windows. The Statue of Liberty fell in the quicksand to like the boy that is in quicksand. After the saw electric post that had cloth on them and they were wondering if it was that because two hours later it did a nother boom it was louder than a dog barking. The boy followed the foot print better other boy and glided it to him and buildings collapsed and planets from the electric post they were wondering if it was from there. There were many planets about 6 or 5. The End.

Writing Skill	How You Did	What You Can Do Better
Describing Places	You included some exciting details about the setting like the red sky, quicksand, and broken buildings!	Try adding more details about how places look, sound, and feel. What did the quicksand feel like? How did the air smell after the explosion?
Describing People	You mentioned two kids in your story.	Tell us more about these kids! What are their names? How do they look? Are they brave, scared, or curious? Sharing these details helps readers picture your characters better.
Using Vocabulary Well	You used some great words like "flabbergasted" (flabbergasted) and described the boom as "louder than a dog barking."	Double-check your spelling of tricky words. Try using different words to describe things instead of using "was" and "were" so often. For example, instead of "the sky was red," you could write "the crimson sky glowed above them."
